

The Mourning Widow's Bone Comb

She used to sit by the window with this comb in her hand, counting strokes instead of days.

Each pull through her graying hair felt like smoothing the river's surface after another ship failed to return. The brass line along its spine has worn thin where her thumb pressed hardest, the only place in her house where grief ever learned to be gentle, like a prayer smoothed between tired fingers.